Overview

August 10, 2015 - Following the insiders into basic consumer stocks would have paid off last week as the S&P/TSX Consumer Staples Index was the only major sector benchmark to deliver a positive return, up 1.88%. INK Canadian Insider Index (CIN) member George Weston (INK Edge outlook: sunny; WN) advanced 2.1% on the week which helped push the consumer basics group higher. However, with all the other 9 top-level sectors in the red, both the S&P/TSX Composite (-1.15%) and the mid-cap oriented INK CIN Index (-1.25%) fell last week. Smaller stocks generally took it hardest with the S&P/TSX Small Cap (-1.82%) and the exchange's mid-cap oriented benchmark the S&P/TSX Completion Index (-1.99%) both tumbling.

As oil set new lows and Energy stocks stumbled, insiders appeared to lose their fear and started buying more shares. Our 30-day Energy Indicator jumped over the 400% mark at which point there are four stocks with key insider buying for every one with selling. While this remains below the levels seen in the early winter, it is the first time this summer that insiders have bought with conviction. Value appears to be emerging, even if growth opportunities remain uncertain.

Indeed, in a sign of what may lay ahead for companies in the sector with borrowing capacity, INK CIN member Surge Energy (INK Edge outlook: mixed; SGY) announced on Thursday that it would put its line of credit to work to support share buybacks. Their share price surged 18% on the news. While the news of buybacks may warm the hearts of shareholders of stocks that go down that path, it likely won't bring a smile to Bank of Canada Stephen Poloz who believes his rate cuts will spur capital investment.

The Poloz rate cuts certainly did not help the cause of High Liner Foods (INK Edge outlook: mixed; HLF) shareholders who saw their shares lose about 20% in value when the company said last Wednesday that second quarter sales dropped as it was unable to pass along rising costs to its American consumers. What happened with High Liner demonstrates that not all consumer basics stocks will fare the same in our central bank planned economy. Those companies unable to pass along rising input prices to its consumers are going to feel the pain.

High Liner Foods had better hope that the US Federal Reserve is able to make more progress on its consumer inflation mandate, but that seem unlikely in the short term. Fed officials continue to signal that a rate hike is on the way and the bond market is starting to buy the story, but not in a good way. On Friday, the US yield curve flattened as the Labor Department reported that the economy churned out 215,000 jobs last month, below expectations but probably not enough to delay a rate hike. The fact that the yield did not steepen suggests the economy is slowing down, not accelerating. Normally, this would not be the environment for tighter monetary policy, but the US central bank is determined to move rates off the zero bound.

We will have to see if the American central bank is able to execute what is becoming a very tricky maneuver: raise rates without sending the US dollar soaring so high as to endanger the recovery. To help pull off its impending tightening, we expect to soon hear either a "one and done" or "two and we are through" message from Fed officials. The goal would be to help limit bullish sentiment towards the greenback.

Meanwhile, given the clear indications of a slowing economy in China over the weekend with tumbling trade numbers, market participants are starting to expect a significant round of shovel-ready stimulus from the world's second largest economy. That could help build a floor for commodity prices. In fact, even though the currency value of Chinese imports dropped last month, according to Reuters there was a pick-up in the volume of key commodities such as coal.

A bottoming in commodities combined with a topping in the greenback over the next month or so could set the stage for a reflation rally at some point before year end. The expectation of that scenario playing out could help explain the renewed bullishness we are also seeing in the Basic Materials sector where our 30-day indicator was also jumping last week, surpassing the 500% level.

A reflation scenario is by no means a sure bet, however, even as insiders on balance are positioning for such an outcome. Risks remain that the Fed may blunder in its rate strategy or China's economy could continue to sag. Last week also saw a rush in sentiment among real estate investors with our REIT Indicator jumping to 1200% at one point. With long rates moving back down, it seems insiders are hedging their bets as to whether or not inflation can make a sustained comeback.
